THE storm-center of the Republican campaign is to be closer to Maysville than it ever has been. Cincinnati is to be TAFT's headquarters, and FORAKER and LONGWORTH are also there. Besides, we must not forget Brother CHARLEY and his barrel.

POOR LITTLE LINA

Poor Little Lina. She "lived out" with Mr. and Mrs. Kingsford.

The father had gone to the dogs long ago, and the mother, a red-eyed, bulbous-nosed creature, wrapped in shapeless rags and those queer, faded shawls of which tipsy women seem to have a monopoly, now and then haunted the home.

The only son of the house, Charles Kingsford, was just her own age. In fact, Lina had fallen in love with him, and now and then her humble pillow was wet with tears.

Charles Kingsford was not a worthless rascal, but he was a very wild young fellow. He led the life wild young men lead in a great city, and got into one small scrape after another, until at last a mighty trouble fell upon him.

There was nothing for it but to leave the city, to leave home and friends.

It was a stormy night. Mr. and Mrs. Kingsford had been to a church meeting, and a collection had been taken up. The money—$500—was given in charge of Mr. Kingsford, who, instantly on his return, locked it up in the drawer of a desk in the back parlor.

On this occasion Charles also sought his room at once, and to Lina was left the task of locking up the house and seeing that all the fires were safe. Mrs. Kingsford awoke with a start. She distinctly heard the noise of voices below. Women's plainly.

Mrs. Kingsford stole downstairs. The back parlor door was closed, but it had a keyhole. One cannot see much through a keyhole, but what she did see was enough. A bulbous-nosed woman, in a miserable bonnet and shawl, sitting before the fire drinking a cup of tea—Lina's mother.

"I knew it was a liberty," said Lina, "but the other fires were all out. Mrs. Kingsford, and it was so cold. It's my mother, ma'am."

"Will you tell your mother that we are going to lock up for the night?"

"Yes, ma'am," said Lina.

Lina, having seen her mother out into the storm, put out the light and crouched down by the grate. Poor Lina!

Then she heard the sound of steps approaching, and shrank back into the shadows.

It was an hour before she went to bed, and then she crept upstairs shivering and trembling, overcome with horror. What was it she had seen? Whatever it was, she told nothing of it to any one.

The next morning she was up as usual, and found Mrs. Kingsford astray. "My son is called away on business," she said. "It is something very unexpected."

Two hours later Mrs. Kingsford called Lina into the back parlor and shut the door. Mr. Kingsford was standing before the desk in which he had deposited the money he held in trust, the night before.

"Do you see this, Lina?" he asked, showing her the broken lock.

"I do not think you guilty, Lina," said Mrs. Kingsford; "but you know your mother is not a respectable woman, and she was here last night."

"Madam!" cried Lina, "my poor mother is innocent. I tell you that I swear it. I mean what I say."

"Then you know who took it," said Mrs. Kingsford. "I see that in your face; confess."

"I tell you my mother is innocent," said Lina. "It is I who am guilty!"

And so, with this confession, and with an obstinate refusal to say more, poor Lina sealed her fate. She was tried for the theft and sentenced, in consequence of her previous good character, to the lightest possible term of imprisonment.

As for Charles Kingsford, no one heard of him for years. Home he came one day—a brown man with a long beard, whom no one knew at first. He sat by the fireside and was questioned and asked questions. At last he said:

"And what has become of poor Lina? Has she married?"

And then came the story of the theft and its punishment.

The words were scarcely out of Mrs. Kingsford's lips when her son—the great bearded man of whom she was so proud—clasped his hands over his eyes and burst into tears like any woman.

"My God!" he cried. "Has Lina suffered this for me? Father, she was as innocent as an angel! It was I who robbed your desk! I have been the cause of ruin to one who was almost an angel."

He spent long months in searching for Lina, and he found her at last.

In a wretched home she sat sewing, by the light of a poor tallow candle.

"Master Charles!" she said; "I never thought I should see you again."

"I know all, Lina. Why did you make such a sacrifice?"

"It was either mother or you," she said.

He looked in her face, took her hand and put it to his lips.

When Charles Kingsford sailed for his new home in California his wife went with him, and the mother's pride had been laid low; for, as they parted on the steamer's deck, she kissed not only her son, but his wife, also.

After Prohibition.

"What are the lost arts?" inquired the student.

"I don't know all of them," answered Col. Stillwell, "but making a mint julep is one."

The Bank of Maysville's big business keeps up. The statement published elsewhere shows a surplus of $25,000, undivided profits $387.65, and deposits subject to check of $491,585.81. The total assets and liabilities make the handsome showing of $606,391.76.

Rupert L. Stairs and Miss Nina Lytle, both of Bracken county, were married in the Dennison Hotel parlor, Cincinnati, Tuesday evening, Rev. Heber D. Ketcham officiating. Mr. and Mrs. Stairs left yesterday for Buffalo, their first stopping point on an extended Eastern trip.

Always ready at a moment's notice when a statement is called for, the State National Bank's report published yesterday showed the institution to be in splendid condition. With a surplus and undivided profits of $27,321.02, Government deposits of $50,000 and individual deposits of $466,235.05, it shows that this Bank occupies an enviable place in the financial circles of this section.

Mr. Frazee Weaver, the Minerva apiarist, Tuesday shipped by rail from Dover 3,000 pounds of a fine quality of strained honey. This is the first of the two harvests of honey of the year. Mr. C. T. Biggers of near Dover will have as much or more from his apiary. Thus it can be easily calculated that during 1908 the bees belonging to these two gentlemen will have gathered over twelve thousand pounds of honey.—Dover News.

GOOD ROADS CONVENTION

Meeting at Eminence Tomorrow Which Should Have Far-Reaching Effect

The Good Roads Convention called by Governor Willson to meet at Eminence tomorrow will mark the beginning of a new era for good roads in Kentucky.

The meeting will be attended by State officials, members of the General Assembly and United States Government experts will demonstrate building and exhibit the most improved machinery. The Federal Government has just completed one mile of model road near Eminence, which will be used as an object lesson.

This fall the amendment to the constitution providing for State aid in road building will be voted on, and the promoters of good roads will use this occasion for a campaign of education.

The following is the tentative program scheduled for the meeting—

Introductory Remarks—Former Lieutenant Governor W. P. Thorne.

Address—Governor A. E. Willson.

Address—Wallace Rowe, Kentucky State University.

Road Talk—Senator Joe Bosworth, father of good roads in Kentucky.

Address—B. F. Heidel, United States Government expert, from Washington, D. C.

Macadam Road Construction—George P. Williams, Government expert in charge of model roads.

In addition, there will be demonstrations of road construction; also demonstrations of different oils for surfacing roads after completion.

It is the intention of this conference to organize a permanent good roads organization, to elect a permanent Secretary and to establish permanent headquarters so that information regarding good roads may be disseminated before the next meeting of the Legislature.
